01 AUDIENCE PROBLEM & HYPOTHESIS

Everyday questions about candy prices and medicine packaging hide complex economics and supply chains. The content premise: a familiar question, visible cause and effect, and an early payoff can make these mechanisms understandable without specialist knowledge.

02 EVIDENCE THAT GUIDED ITERATION

Production review flagged a slow, sparse opening and visuals that were hard to read on a phone. Another review caught an animation that accidentally implied the price had fallen back. These qualitative findings supplied specific reasons to revise the product.

03 PRODUCT CHANGES

Review finding	Decision and purpose
The opening hid the central question.	Rebuilt it around a stocked shop, rising price wheels and one unchanged candy price, making the paradox visible immediately.
A thin transaction path was unreadable on a phone.	Replaced it with recognizable coins and an empty change slot; prioritized comprehension over visual complexity.
The price appeared to revert during an animation.	Kept the new price visible while showing missing change separately; preserved factual meaning during the redesign.

04 TECHNICAL DELIVERY & EXPERIMENT DESIGN

Owned the workflow from audience questions and research to creative briefs, production and publishing. With Claude, developed reusable React/TypeScript components and a Remotion pipeline with narration-based timing and automated QA. A branding-update report compares 11,574 frames of the lossless master, preserving audio and pixels outside the specified lettering regions.

Developed three title-and-thumbnail directions for the medicine-packaging film: a direct comparison, a hidden supply-chain reason and an unexpected tie. Prepared phone-feed previews and a watch-time-based comparison plan. The records document alternatives and a proposed test, not a winning variant.

05 RESULTS & PRODUCT SKILLS

A real audience of 6,120 followers, plus documented product ownership, requirements definition, prioritization, AI-assisted development and technical communication. Next: connect published versions to watch time, completion, saves/shares and follows, accounting for topic and distribution differences.

Measurement boundary: public profile totals and production-review evidence. No private retention data or controlled growth lift was available. Product framing is a retrospective synthesis of documented decisions.
